Railway History in Saskatchewan

In the spring of 1885, the Canadian Pacific Railway was still incomplete when the North-West Rebellion broke out in what is now Saskatchewan.

Government officials needed to move troops quickly from Eastern Canada to Saskatchewan, but many doubted the unfinished railway could handle the task.

Canadian Pacific Railway General Manager William Cornelius Van Horne assured the government it could be done. Using sections of newly laid track and temporary construction routes, the CPR transported thousands of soldiers westward to Qu'Appelle and other locations in the region. The rapid movement of troops helped the federal government respond to the uprising and demonstrated the strategic importance of a transcontinental railway.
